The aphorism depicted in the image should not be taken as a personal slight or as a counter-accusation: 'You think I am a fool, so you are a fool.'

That would be too simplistic.

The speaking 'I' here represents a being at one with itself, living out of unity and Love.

Anyone who disparages this way of being does not encounter its foolishness, but above all their own distance from unity. The disparagement then says less about what is recognised than about the limitations of the one who recognises it.

'Foolishness' is not a meaningful value judgement within unity. It only arises where unity is missed and replaced by projection.
